The public ceremonial over, the Victoria Bridge was not yet opened, --descending from the platform, the Prince of Wales, his suite, and the gentlemen connected with the bridge, entered the railway car and were borne to the centre of the tunnel, where four rivets (one a silver one, reserved for the Royal hand,) were alone wanting to complete the structure. The hammers of the bronze workmen soon resounded through the vault like dim illumined space, and brought their task to an end. When the Prince s turn came, he seized the hammer wrong end up, and laughed heartily when told of the mistake, a few vigorous blows from the Royal hammer fastened in the rivet, and brought to a successful close the labours of fifteen years. An Address was then read in the tunnel by the Directors, giving a long...
