Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: . . . the want of them (before, and not after, war breaks out) in their colonies and abroad. The very cheap price at which schools can now get the one-inch map of Britain puts the local sheet within the reach of every schoolboy in the country. The Board of Agriculture deserves the thanks of all Englishmen for the new regulations which permit this. In geographical literature and cartography the advance is conspicuous. The Exhibition downstairs has not been open long enough to justify me in attempting any selection or criticism, but we have all appreciated the volumes of Dr. Mill and Dr. Keltie and Mr. Chisholm. Our Societys organ, The Geographical Teacher, has entered on what I trust may prove a successful career. Its success must depend, however, on the support it receives from readers and advertisers. It is desirable that every member of the Association should do his best to increase its circulation. I prefer, however, to spend such minutes as remain to me rather in speaking of our shortcomings than our successes. I am a little nervous as to some of the new methods. They seem to me not to take into account human nature--at least, child-nature. I read the other day, in an article kindly sent me from the Antipodes, that a childs first step in order to gain knowledge of the World we live in ought to be to draw a picture of the schoolroom table and the objects on it. This sort of...
