But there are complexities and difficulties attending any comprehensive discussion of the subject. As a preliminary observation it would seem to be sufficiently obvious that some parallel should be established between pianoforte playing as a study subject and other branches of the public school curriculum. At first sight it would seem to be obvious that anything like the standardization of high school work in pianoforte playing should be preceded by equally definite standards of grade school work in the same subject. In other words, any course in piano playing relating itself to a high school course of study would seem to pre-suppose a preparation in pianoforte playing analogous to the preparation pre-supposed in other branches of study. But it is not clear that even this preliminary observation can safely be accepted as a premise or consistently followed to its logical conclusion....
